With the replacement of Tagore by Gandhi, who declared the conquest of the West by Asian spirituality, Indian Asianism later turned into a principle of national independence. However, it has been the general trend among South Korean intelligentsia to criticize immediately any mention of return to East Asia as voluntary surrender to the so-called theory of cultural clashes, whereby the United States is trying to assert and strengthen her supremacy over the world in new ways.

From then on, this short but humiliating war was to lie deep within the Korean psyche as a memory at best forgotten, one that would be much better if obliterated altogether. Why did Asianism fail to become a major issue in the Middle Kingdom, which underwent disastrous conflicts with the West after incomparably early contacts?
