Public administration

Additionally, duration of infertility and the number of previous failed ART treatment cycles were not related with emotional adjustment at any of the times assessed for either men or women. In the second stage, where couples were undergoing treatments, holding higher success expectations, psychological distress was in normal range. Indirect effects of history of infertility on men and women's emotional adjustment The results of the present study underline that adjustment to infertility is a highly personal experience, influenced by previous experience and by each person's own representations of the importance of parenthood in their own lives.
