NHS commissioning

The demands on Mackey and his leadership team are intense. The target for treating cancer patients within 62 days of urgent GP referral has not been met for over 5 years, and survey evidence suggests more people are experiencing lengthening delays in getting GP appointments. Local politicians will need to be on board.

Who will shape the new NHS?

It may however be that in this case the private provider was more innately customer focussed than public sector providers might be. Carers across the country are at breaking point.

The practice of commissioning healthcare from a private provider: learning from an in

The task for commissioners is to enable citizens and others to co-produce the vision. If the NHS is to achieve its long-term vision of a service that can prevent ill-health, better manage long-term conditions, and treat people earlier, NHS staff will need time, space and skills to make change at all levels of the health and care system.

Who will shape the new NHS?

Practice-based commissioning Evaluation of practice-based commissioning indicates that it has had little impact in terms of improving use of resources or providing better services, and examples of initiatives attributed to PBC tend to be small-scale local pilots. Why are people choosing residential care when they could afford alternatives? We need to modernise commissioning.

Five traps to avoid in a new round of NHS legislation

Getting it wrong would risk financially destabilising providers.
