Abstract : Sex Trafficking: Examining Links to Prostitution and the Routine Activity Theory

Important future research implications as well as policy implications were discussed. However, sex trafficking victims do not always cross international borders; these victims can be trafficked within their own countries.

The Link Between Prostitution and Sex Trafficking

On average, countries with legalized prostitution report a greater incidence of human trafficking inflows. Government adopted a strong position against legalized prostitution in a December 2002 National Security Presidential Directive based on evidence that prostitution is inherently harmful and dehumanizing, and fuels trafficking in persons, a form of modern-day slavery. Prostitution and related activities—including pimping and patronizing or maintaining brothels—fuel the growth of modern-day slavery by providing a façade behind which traffickers for sexual exploitation operate.

Abstract : Sex Trafficking: Examining Links to Prostitution and the Routine Activity Theory

Arcade Publishing, New York, 2004. Qualitative data were collected by interviewing law enforcement agents along the east coast region of the United States. Of the estimated 600,000 to 800,000 people trafficked across international borders annually, 80 percent of victims are female, and up to 50 percent are minors.

Drawing upon a polymorphous approach, this research acknowledges that this binary understanding of prostitution is reductive: sex work cannot be reduced to either one perspective Weitzer, 2010. While trafficking inflows may be lower where prostitution is criminalized, there may be severe repercussions for those working in the industry.
