Correspondence of Wagner and Liszt : Wagner, Richard, 1813

DEAR FRIEND, Excuse me for applying to you again so soon. More I cannot say, not just after having heard it, but of what I say I am as full as man can be. Your personality will do much good, more than my personality will be able to do all my life; for I cannot help myself.

Correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, Volume 2 by Francis Hueffer (translator)

If some one were to PAY ME WELL for it, I might still be inclined to publish it.

Correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, Volume 1

This organ of perception, which originally and in normal cases looks outward for the purpose of satisfying the wants of the will of life, receives in the case of an abnormal development such vivid and such striking impressions from outside that for a time it emancipates itself from the service of the will, which originally had fashioned it for its own ends.

My position is all the more painful because I can take no steps to free myself from the suspicion of such sentiments without incurring the worse suspicion of meanness and cowardice. Imagine a very long sigh here.

Correspondence of Wagner and Liszt, Volume 2 by Francis Hueffer (translator)

He pleases me better than ever.

Correspondence of Wagner and Liszt — Volume 2 on Apple Books

To work my best, my inmost salvation, I am not in a position to rely on merit, but on grace. All the motive power which, for a time, I derived from my dreary solitude is gradually losing its force. He had written three operas, all of which had met with fair success, but none of which had taken real hold of the public, and the Court theatres of Germany were naturally not very prone to favour the interests of an outlawed rebel.
