Gender, cooperative organisation and participatory intervention in rural Tanzania : a case study of different types of cooperatives and Moshi University College's support to rural women

Study limitations It is important to note that interviews and focus group discussions are time-consuming activities, of an extractive nature. I thank Tanzanian colleagues at WUR for their support while in Netherlands, particularly Joyce Challe who was close to me. Like in the case of cooperatives it includes exchange of information, carrying out of activities and the sharing of resources for mutual benefit, and to some common purpose.

The research process Basically the study was built up in four phases, as shown in Figure 1. You became a reliable assistance, charming, caring, your smile and laughter made me happy and feel at home. This led to a better atmosphere, a more open exchange, and a more thorough understanding of a set of local problems on my part.

All the instruments and interviews were performed in Swahili, the lingua franca of rural Tanzania, and later the researcher translated written answers and field notes into English. I really appreciate the time you invested and corrections that you made to the proposal and final thesis which contributed to the perfection of the book.
