TRANS MAN'S HYMN

One January dawn when I closed my eyes, my soul opened up its petals to the sky like a sacrifice on a golden altar and inside the white meat of all my lives there stood Caeneus, dew-damp and unbreakable.

He pointed at the heart in my chest, told me tenderly: There lies the golden bird, so I've been searching for a way to free it ever since, gifting lemon rinds and ivy leaves to Dionysus for growth, praying to Artemis when the moon hangs fat and heavy as a summer calf about transformation of bodies. Every day I rifle back through my bones to see how far I've become, what I've become.

the whispery, river-like bleed of me from shape to shape, from skin to skin, hymns of me singing / am, / am to the fountains and their wishing coins at twilight. I am chicory seed. I am yellow-feathered hope.

I am refrains about dreaming. I am legends that wait in the blood. I am mason jars full of secrets that shine out signals to you with their bioluminescent bodies— Notice me, name me, shelter me in the sunlight of your bones.

Kinsey and John McPherson, Echoes of Glory. But — as I take my morning walk and listen to the sound of the wind in the trees, the cawing of the blue jays, and watch as the golden glow warms the sky, I am also thinking of ways to express it — in photos, in art, and especially in words.

The rest of the poem is pretty good, too. In its attempt to approximate a purely metaphysical proposition in practical terms or exoterically prove every esoteric percept, this kind of religious literalism takes away from the purity of esotericism and the virtues of scientific falsification.
