The 1905 Mutiny on the Battleship Potemkin

Furious at the draconian punishments meted out by their captain, Hugh Pigot, roughly 30 men split into groups and launched a coordinated attack on their superiors. In total, there are going to be ten of them and in the first half of the 21st century they will constitute the core of the Russian nuclear deterrence system. It appeared that the mutiny was led by only a small cadre of sailors, and at least half of the crew wanted no part in it, knowing that failure meant a death sentence or long imprisonment in Siberia.

Potemkin Stairs

Ten more years would pass before Nicholas II was finally deposed, but following the rise of communism, Soviet propagandists repackaged the Black Sea mutineers as early heroes of the revolution.

The Mutiny on the Potemkin

The groundwork for the rebellion had begun months before, when many of the more experienced officers from the Black Sea Fleet had been transferred to the Pacific, for the Russo-Japanese War.

Christian Rakovsky: Origins of the 'Potemkin' Mutiny (1924)

Tensions came to a head on the 27th. You know the boulevard is banned to lower ranks! The following morning, loyalist members of Georgii Pobedonosets retook control of the ship and ran her aground in Odessa harbour.
