counter-cultural revolution of the 60s, the integration within education is part of a globally structured agenda for education Dale, 2000. The main finding is that in the global structured agenda to education there is very small room for issues related to family life, gender equality and conciliation between work and family responsibilities. While transition policies have been on the agenda of many countries over the past decade, little research has been done into how OECD countries design, implement, manage and monitor transitions.

In previous study Haddad, 2002, I defended the idea that wide world events such as the Cold War, the Western cultural revolution of the 1960s and 1970s and Globalization clearly influenced the adoption of a more or less integrated approach to ECCE. Minister for Children and Youth Affairs of Ireland, and Montserrat Gomendio, Deputy Director for Education and Skills, OECD.
