Instead this highly physical and often graphically unsettling account offers a brutal portrait of a gnarled and disordered mind. Two wrongs do not make a right and ethically speaking never can.

The Manipulative Nature of Claudius in Shakespeare's

Hamlet was well liked by the people, for reasons we are not aware of, and his punishment could lead the people to rally around him and rise up against the King. She also enjoys the physical aspects of her marriage to Claudius—a point that disturbs Hamlet. The tone of these two speeches, also, is similar; both, though directed toward one person, are made before a larger audience of listeners, and so are somewhat formal, impersonal, and diplomatic in language and form, in order to sound proper and impress their point on those who are not being directly addressed.
