Ethical and Policy Issues in Research Involving Human Participants

Fueled by decreasing state and federal support in recent years, public universities have been forced to take on a more significant share of their own funding, with development playing a major role in this process. These bodies had been sanctioned by legislation in 1916, and Congress had never repealed the authorization. Ethical and Policy Issues in Research Involving Human Participants

I can see how some individuals could use this section to keep the military out of domestic peacekeeping. At this point the Navy was authorized 35 battleships, 20 aircraft carriers, and 88 cruisers in addition to hundreds of destroyers and other smaller ships.

Disaster Preparedness

Successful litigation does not necessarily translate quickly into actual improvement. This move was essential because during the war automobile manufacturers produced more than 50 percent of all aircraft engines, 33 percent of all machine guns, 80 percent of all tanks and tank parts, one half the diesel engines, and 100 percent of the trucks the Army moved on.

Disaster and Emergency Planning for Preparedness, Response, and Recovery

If gaps exist between purpose and performance, monitoring should help to identify their nature, magnitude, and location and should ensure the development of measures to close them. The mentally ill serve an average of at least twelve additional months for violent and property offenses. Kennedy, May 8, 1961, John F. Although there had been rudimentary forms of organization for the protection of non-combatants in previous conflicts—for example, the American Civil War of the 1860s—the attack on Guernica, in the Basque country of Spain, on April 26, 1937, by German aircraft was the first concerted aerial bombardment it killed 1,654 civilians and the first occasion on which this had to be countered by properly organized measures of protection. There were fewer than 200,000 men in the Army, only 125,202 in the Navy and fewer than 20,000 in the Marine Corps.

POSTWORLD WAR II GROUP PSYCHOLOGY AND THE LIMITS OF LEADERSHIP: BRON, LACAN AND THE LEADERLESS GROUP

Max Maher, University of Essex, UK

Introduction

In 1946, Lacan gave a lecture about the time he spent in Britain at the very end of World War II, published in 1947 as 'British Psychoanalysis and the War' in the journal L'Evolution Psychologique (Lacan, 2000). He is enthusiastically supportive of the way the British military was able to apply Freudian ideas to the army, praising the quality of education in Britain, and the nation's effective use of propaganda, which allowed the British Army to mobilise efficiently every member of the comparatively small nation in the 'symbolic creation of an army' able to rival the European forces (Lacan, 1947, p. 11). According to Lacan, it was the British Army's successful use of technology, science and science which allowed them to overcome the Germans, whose army, though also democratic in its structure, and though inheriting more advanced the might of the military tradition, maintained a traditional identification of the officer as the 'sacred warrior' (p. 12). Lacan particularly admires the use of psychoanalysis to select British soldiers, and explains how this allowed them successfully to identify 'chillies', and those susceptible to mental breakdowns, who could then be found suitable sites away from the front line. In all this, the British had put to use Freudian group psychology: they had utilised the power of 'horizontal' identification between troops to ensure their homogeneity as groups and to boost morale (p. 14). Lacan speaks with deep admiration of the experiments in group therapy led by W.H. Ryle and John Rickman during the war. He also praises Binet's 'Londoners Group'.

MAX MAHER is a PhD candidate at the University of Essex, researching Jacques Lacan's engagement with Marxist theory. His thesis, 'Question of the Subject', examines his engagement in Lacan's psychoanalytic reading of Marx, and reflects a different way of thinking about the relationship. He is also interested in the politics of the day of mental health, and is currently working with the North East Anonymity on a project challenging political assumptions about health and employment.
