Claes Oldenburg born 1929

Over the second half of the 1960s, he began to produce an extensive series of drawings of fantasy architecture, which led to prints and later, public monuments. Juxtaposed or superimposed, the components are put together into an image through a dialogue between us that proceeds like a game of Ping-Pong, to and fro, toward its ultimate crystallization, first into a sketch and then into a three-dimensional study or a model, a process of using the senses rather than analysis, in sharp contrast to the rational fabrication phase that follows.

The theme and form of musical instruments proved ideal for exploring physical and material transformations and the resulting shifts in meaning. He had created collages and drawings that played with the notion of massive domestic objects in public places, but Lipstick was his first large-scale public artwork. Iconic examples of Oldenburg's early sculpture on view include Giant BLT Bacon, Lettuce, and Tomato Sandwich 1963 , French Fries and Ketchup 1963 , and Soft Toilet 1966.

Claes Oldenburg and Coosje van Bruggen, Dropped Cone, 2001

Another theme in his work is soft sculpture versions of everyday objects. The couple's collaboration with Gehry also involved a return to performance for Oldenburg when the trio presented Il Corso del Coltello, in , Italy, in 1985; other characters were portrayed by and.
