Food for Thought

Telfer convincingly argues that eating and drinking have value beyond that which they have solely as necessities of life—a value which ties them to the exercise of our own autonomy and individuality, to our interest in friendship and hospitableness to others, and to our aesthetic and lifestyle interests.

Bill Brownstein: Some food for thought about nutritional psychiatry

Our positive mental states can be further enhanced by eating with friends and family, which is now quite problematic during the current lockdown. It is also concerned with the use and merit of science and sometimes overlaps and by exploring whether scientific results are actually a study of truth.
