Mazā mashin no yume: Nippon kōsaku kikai kōgyōshi (The Dream of Mother Machines: The History of the Japanese Machine Tool Industry)

For the first two years, I lived in Taishō Ward of Osaka City, where approximately 20,000 of the 75,043 residents—including my neighbors at the time—are Okinawan migrants or their descendants. I conducted interviews, administered a survey questionnaire, and collected writings by and about Okinawans on the mainland. This is because personal provisions give birth to a personal mentality, producing fissures in the absolute obedience most cherished by the Japanese military.

The Battlefield Experience of Japanese Soldiers in the Asia

Such death ratios were not necessarily a given, as can be seen in the high officer-to-enlisted soldier casualty rates of the British Army in WWI, where nearly half of all officers became casualties during the first year. The majority of the troops were either soldiers from the conscript reserves or new recruits with only two months of experience; less than half were active-service soldiers who had received proper training. Diachronic variation in modern Japanese literary text: Analysis based on etymological types ratios and part of speech ratios.

Mazā mashin no yume: Nippon kōsaku kikai kōgyōshi (The Dream of Mother Machines: The History of the Japanese Machine Tool Industry)

This article is adapted from the introduction to Steve Rabson,. Written over the course of twenty-four years by a group of military officers-turned-officials who did not necessarily have historical training, the Bōeichō-commissioned project was meant to present an official version of the events of the war.

Being Okinawan in Japan: The Diaspora Experience

BT 36 First and second reserve troops had previously undergone an intensive two-year regimen as active-service soldiers and looked down on officers called in from the conscript reserve ranks—whom they regarded as inferior because of their lack of proper training—as well as reserve officers and non-commissioned officers who were younger. The centers were run by committees consisting of officials, assembly members, and special members. New words were responded to as understandable, doubtful, and difficult.
