Ultimately, Crick's conception of politics as the rough-mannered but nonetheless delicate art of conciliation between conflicting viewpoints, gives weight to what good old Gough Whitlam would say later about it - 'only the impotent are pure'. Present day cosmopolitanism is, to a very large degree, a product of another German philosopher named Immanuel Kant writing at the end of the eighteenth century. In this celebration of the political world, Bernard Crick asserts that politics, with its compromises and power struggles, remains the only tested alternative to government by coercion.

But it appears Schneider went into the meeting with a political agenda. So I end with this question.

In Defense of Politics, Crick

Afghanistan held elections to choose a new President and to elect a new Parliament, and in those parliamentary elections, more than six million Afghans defied terrorist threats and cast their ballots.

My own view is probably the same as yours: our debates should be both less ad hominem and more spirited, less trivial and more serious. But it will take two things to reinvigorate this politics. In order to prove this defense, the defendants will be able to submit evidence and witness testimony describing their motivations or communicating other political messages.

Debatable premise, very interesting points.

In Defence of Politics

Defendants who choose to represent themselves are typically allowed greater latitude than lawyers are, and may be able to directly communicate their political message during opening statements, closing statements, or witness examination. This is when politics becomes blood sport.

PLSC 114

Are we simply determined or condemned by the accident of birth to live by the traditions of the particular nation in which we happen to have been born? For example, in the trial of the , the defendants made an defense alleging that FBI agents had convinced the group to undertake their allegedly illegal conduct. However, I would argue that the balance has radically shifted, in both traditional and social media, away from local social change toward a focus on national policy and personalities. But this requires us to listen to others, to weigh their arguments with care, and maybe even to learn from them.
