And I think the result was quite a success. This is exemplified and explicitly taught in early ethical primers such as the Conduct of Three Bonds, with Illustrations Samgang haengsilto. Japanese scholars of Korean literature, such as Ōmura Masuo, Saegusa Toshikatsu, Hatano Setsuko, Hotei Toshihiro, Shirakawa Yutaka, Watanabe Naoki, Serikawa Tetsuya, and Fujiishi Takayo, have made important contributions by introducing Korean literature to Japanese audiences through translations, compendiums, and scholarly writings.

Furthermore, such recognitions of the colonial writer and colonial literature in the metropolitan literary field at this time, far from celebrating the value or talent of authors as individual artists, interpellated and relegated them to new secondary roles as ethnic translators or native informants. For the writer situated at the front lines of the colonial divide, the split gaze of the audience refuses a one-to-one correspondence between the writing subject, the text, and the addressee. Such rewriting was not an isolated incident. Rather than looking to the ancient Chinese past for the roots of the problem, he points to the effects of the modern technologies of censorship and disciplinary control, in the contemporary mass media of Japanese imperial policies.
