From 1784—5 disenchantment was all the greater. At an erudite level the attack was mounted in Austria by Gerard van Swieten, by his successor as physician-in-ordinary to Maria Theresa, another Dutchman, Anton de Haen, by the Tyrolean Girolamo Tartarotti, and by other leaders of the intelligentsia; while a stream of writers in the other languages of the area found a common purpose in literature of popular instruction against obscurantism. We can see it too in their linguistic practice.

Madame Dubarry (1919)

Remarkably, the Viennese even found some interest in the previously unregarded literary productivity of that negligent Renaissance ruler, Rudolf II. Wider context in Paula S. The Austrian army furnished the third new bulwark of Habsburg power in the eighteenth century, and in some ways the most novel, though it was also the most intimately dynastic.
