Definition: A literature review is an objective, critical summary of published research literature relevant to a topic under consideration for research. Its purpose is to ensure familiarity with current thinking and research on a particular topic, and may justify future research into a previously overlooked or understudied area.

A typical literature review consists of the following components:

1. Introduction:
 - A concise definition of a topic under consideration (this may be a descriptive or argumentative thesis, or proposal), as well as the scope of the related literature being investigated. (Example: If the topic under consideration is the impact of climate change on the Great Barrier Reef, the introduction should include a brief explanation of what is meant by climate change, and what is meant by the Great Barrier Reef.)
 - The introduction should also introduce readers. (Example: "This review will explore the effects of climate change on the Great Barrier Reef.")
 - Another purpose of the introduction is to state the main findings of the review (what do most of the sources conclude), and comment on the availability of sources on the subject area.)
2. Main body:
 - There are many ways to organize the evaluation of the sources. Chronological and thematic approaches are the most common.
 - Each work should be briefly summarized and evaluated in its present methodology, results, conclusion. It is important to address inconsistencies, anomalies, and errors, as it is to identify accuracy, depth, and relevance.
 - Use logical connections or transitions to connect sources.
3. Conclusion:
 - The conclusion summarizes the key findings of the review in general terms. Notable contributions between works, whether favorable or not, may be included here.
 - The conclusion is the review's opportunity to justify a research proposal. Therefore, the discussion should restate and support conclusions from the findings of the review.
4. References:
 - As with all sections in the document, a literature review must contain complete and correct citations for every source.
