Amazing Photographs of Prospectors Carrying Supplies Ascending the Chilkoot Pass During the Klondike Gold Rush ~ Vintage Everyday

This was a pattern that would repeat itself across the West anytime a mineral discovery was made, from the Southwest and Tombstone to the Dakotas and Deadwood. There was no railway until 1899. As the era wore on, however, and the number of miners continued to rise and, as the strike rate fell, things inevitably turned nasty.

The ECHO

The earliest gold-seekers were people who lived near California or people who heard the news from ships on the fastest sailing routes from California. The Journal of Economic History. More gold seekers from the distant city of set out for Nome aboard the in 1902.

10 Gold Rushes You Should Know About

As camps developed into small cities, the forest around them began to disappear. Also, saloon owners and other service providers made money during the rush. Historian Charlene Porsild has conducted extensive work on these records, comparing them to other documentary accounts of the period.

Nome Gold Rush

Saloons were typically open 24 hours a day, with whiskey the standard drink. An alternative to the South-east Alaskan ports were the All-Canadian routes, so-called because they mostly stayed on Canadian soil throughout their journey. These chemicals can filter into human water sources and the broader environment.
