Dean sheds light on the origins of poststructuralist thought, paying particular attention to the reinterpretation of the self by Jacques Lacan, Georges Bataille, and other French thinkers. Of course that dissolution was itself the product of and a response to cultural perceptions, in particular the psychiatric perceptions of criminals, the New Woman, and other deviants who threatened the return to normalcy after the unprecedented upheaval of that great war. In so doing, they separated truth from knowledge in a new and radical way.

The void of language, he claims, mirrored in complicated ways the abyss symbolized by the power vacuum in French politics during the 1930S.

Focusing on the difficult work of Jacques Lacan and Georges Bataille, Dean furnishes a critical history of the decentered subject in early twentieth-century France—a history that has broader implications given the widespread influence of modern French thought.
