In the Studio: Matisse by Henri Cartier

Paired with the aid of his Leica, Cartier-Bresson discovered the possibility of creating geometrical constructions in photography, structures that were enclosed within a perfect proportion 2:3 of the frame. This assignment led Cartier-Bresson met some of the most prominent creative figures of the period.

On the surface, Cartier-Bresson is depicting a familiar trope from the history of art and, in particular, the recent Impressionist movement: people engaged in leisure activities in the Parisian countryside. He covered the small camera with black paint so that it was even harder for his subjects to see. With a personal show, on the other hand, the artist was a free agent and it was there that his work was judged.

Later that year, Cartier-Bresson married a dancer named Ratna Mohini, who was called Elie by her close companions. Also known as HCB, Henri Cartier-Bresson is one of the most talented photographers of his generation. The half-naked man who seems to be writhing free of the remainder of his clothing could be contorting himself in either agony or ecstasy - the ambiguity is what makes the image, at least in part, so deeply unsettling.

The elevated vantage point of the photographer-observer, at the top of the steep riverbank, initiates a kind of cascading visual effect as he glances down at the picnickers who in turn look down toward the boat as it rests on a river mirroring the sky. The television in the foreground represents the contestant as the viewer at home sees him on their television.
