These buildings were constructed of wooden posts covered with mud plaster and had thatched roofs. One was a conical-shaped earthen mound found to contain skeletons. What we do know about them comes from their camp sites.

People of Detroit

Excavations conducted at in Mingo County identified at least six stages of mound construction.

Mound Builders

Bear Creek Mound Bear Creek Mound — This square, flat-topped mound was built in several stages for ceremonial or elite residential use sometime between 1100 and 1300 A.

Who Were the Mound Builders? (with pictures)

First, are the burial mounds. In years past, many mounds were irreparably damaged or completely destroyed by modern development and looting. Mississippian period mound sites mark centers of social and political authority.

Who Were the Mound Builders? (with pictures)

Due to the proliferation of mounds across North America, most archaeologists feel that there was a time in the distant past when numerous large Native American settlements existed. Many of these mound centers dotted the eastern landscape before Europeans arrived. Both observers noted the high temple mounds which the Natchez had built so that the Great Sun could commune with God, the sun.
