In Post Partum Document there was a reliance on absence in establishing a visual language, one where that which is not deemed desirable by the artist is abandoned and through a complete lack a new language is crafted in the form of absence.

Now, more than twenty years later, the Document's initial challenge to conceptual art and its impact on the emerging discourse of sexual difference have taken on a new significance. They are typical of the drawings made by a young child, not much more than scribbles on rice paper. In retrospect, these markings became the logical terrain on which to map out the signification of the maternal discourse.

This piece is a central work within feminist art that is still a relevant and a fascinating picture of what motherhood means for women. Documentation III: Analysed Markings and Diary Perspective Schema Experimentum Mentis III: Weaning from the Dyad 1975 consists of thirteen individually framed works on paper arranged in a horizontal line.

Therefore its value as a work of art perhaps lies there. The politics of vision and the congruent selfhoods understood in development with these politics could be said to serve as an indicator of shifts within epistemic formalities. Kelly intricately charts her relationship with her son, and her changing role as a mother by writing on artifacts associated with child care: baby clothes, his drawings, items he collects, and his first efforts at writing.

But I've been more relaxed about his aggressivity lately. The whole work was displayed at the Institute of Contemporary Art ICA in 1976.
