These rights should be In November of 2004 on a street in Amsterdam, Mohammed Bouyeri, an angry young Muslim man, shot and killed the controversial Dutch film maker Theo van Gogh, great grand-nephew of the artist Vincent. I adore this idea because I think it's remarkably true. The events which Buruma describes are still fresh, and he writes as if composing a blog on the Internet with a steady stream of thoughts and observations, along with pithy interviews with leading Dutch political and cultural figures, who all have something to say on the subject of Theo van Gogh and his killer, Mohammed B.

Islam Vs the West is not a new topic for me. The story deals with the murder of Theo van Gogh, who is a great grand-son of Theo van Gogh, Vincent's very supportive Brother. The author addresses the challenges of a historically liberal and tolerant culture.

This really is a fascinating little book.

Tolerance in Two Recitations

For if we recreate the naïve mistake the US government made in supporting the Taliban against the Soviet Union in traditional geopolitical gamesmanship, only to see the true believers bite back and destroy the Twin Towers, we run the risk of loosing much more than our innocence this time around.
