PSRs are often formed because the individual lacks the social skills or opportunities to form a real relationship. This identification of those who have a similar level of attraction, and therefore provide a balance between the level of competition intra-sexual and positive traits is referred to as matching. The data are good enough to know that there is no segment of society that is immune from domestic violence—not the rich, not the famous, and not people in same-sex relationships.

On Intimate Terms

Duck 1994 recommends that couples in the intra-psychic phase should be encouraged to think about the positive rather than the negative aspects of their partner. Rusbult 1995 found that for women living in a shelter for abused women, lack of alternatives and high investment were the major factors underlying why women returned to the abusive relationship. The experimental generation of interpersonal closeness: A procedure and some preliminary findings.
