We Too Were Children, Mr. Barrie: ALDOUS HUXLEY: THE CROWS OF PEARBLOSSOM

In 1967, four years after Huxley's death, Random House published the story as a picture book with art by the legendary Barbara Cooney, who had already won the first of her two Caldecott Awards. Crow's eggs always seem to disappear from her nest when she is out doing the afternoon shopping, and neither she nor Mr. Huxley came up with this story while out walking the desert with his little niece and it is written in the way an adult would tell a bedtime story to a child.

Fortunately, Olivia's neighbors the Yosts, mentioned in the story, had a copy that they preserved.

Asking a woman if she's upset because she's over-eaten seems cruel - the implication, I suppose, is that women are prone to hysteria, and are more governed by their bodies than men - while telling her multiple times to shut up is both disrespectful and rude.
