The second time I met her was the same day, but at this point we had become already acquainted with each other and not surprisingly, there was a higher element of disclosure as predicted by the social penetration theory. Nonetheless, far more remains unknown about its indications for various conditions, its optimal dosing, its combination with pharmacotherapy, its utility in different formats, and so forth. Applications The expectancy violation theory can be applied in the study of various interpersonal relationships.

If the patient can solve the life problem, depressive symptoms should resolve as well. Particular personal space is expected from the people whom they interact with according to the relationship they have with them. The paper aims to show whether the predictions made by these theories can be trusted and whether they do indeed reflect how and why humans behave in a certain manner.

Research has demonstrated that depression often follows a disturbing change in one's interpersonal environment such as the death of a loved one complicated bereavement , a struggle with a significant other role dispute , or some other life upheaval: a geographic or career move, the beginning or ending of a marriage or other relationship, or becoming physically ill a role transition. I perceived it positively because it was something that he was used to doing. CONCLUSIONS IPT is a relatively young psychotherapy targeted to particular psychiatric diagnoses.

Sociologists and philosophers have for a long time been baffled by the factors that motivate certain human interaction and communication patterns.

Interpersonal psychotherapy: principles and applications

Violation to this expectation can cause to a perception that will be positive or negative. One the other hand, adjustment can take a divergent approach whereby parties accentuate the differences both social and linguistic that exists between them.

At the relationship development stage, there exists a pattern that is associated with greater disclosure at non-intimate levels. This was a clear proof that the relationship had progressed. By the next day, the relationship had moved to yet another level and as the social penetration theory predicts and the communication level was even more advanced as it ultimately resulted in the exchange of numbers which was in itself a very huge step in the development of this relationship.
