Capitalist society is divided into different classes, and the relationships between those classes shape the production of wealth, the dissemination of ideas and the nature of politics. The role of large mutual and pension funds, as well as of foreign investors, has waxed greatly and concentrated key economic decision-making in an ever-smaller number of hands. Historically, capitalism develops institutions and ideologies that justify surplus extraction and capital accumulation. This paper is an attempt to study the interrelation between changes in the process of capitalist accumulation and the political structure that supports it.
