When people ask what they should do to reduce violence, I think of three things. First, convene the right players in your city. You need multiple agencies. You need the police at the table, the DA and public defenders, and you need social services, mental health, everyone... you need all the right players at the table. Second, set short-term and long-term goals. Everybody wants to solve things now, but a good process may be a slow process. People need to know that up front. There are things you can do right now, of course, but many things take two, five, ten years, because they require investments from not only government sources but the philanthropic community too. Third, have a clear process to do it ethically. scientists, advisory board. Scientists will have all the data, but you need them to assess what science says about any serious proposal. Oh, and one more thing -- Transparency. No matter what the best solution may be, if you are not transparent and telling people what you are doing and why you are doing it, people tend to come up with their own interpretations. They may not agree with everything, and that is fine, but you will need at least some clear common ground.
