The rise of capitalism is thus explained in terms of the rise to prominence of the most productive, rational, and progressive social groups—merchants and manufacturers. This book decisively shows how the birth of capitalism required the dispossession of both small-holders and landless peasants by closing off the commons and forest areas through Enclosures and various Game Laws, for instance and thus removing their supply of food from hunting and gathering and fuel such as wood. Drags a little at times but is engaging for the most part.
