Early Christian architecture in Ireland : Stokes, Margaret, 1832

The original architect had returned to Italy before the first stone was laid, subsequently the Irish Pearce was responsible not only for the construction, but modification and improvement to the original plan. The rainwater that collected in many of these bowls was thought to have certain healing properties. What are unaccountably somewhat less famous are the still complete and which can be favourably compared to anything similar in northern Europe, and the country's many and cathedrals and buildings.
