As a central part of the analysis, he discusses how changes in the geographic origin of the state's residents have affected the educational mix of the work force and the dramatic disparity in earnings between less educated and better educated workers. The overall trend in the wage premium earned by college graduates, as well as the trends for high school graduates and those with less than 12 years of schooling. How these trends varied across industrial and regional sectors in California and between native Californians, natives from elsewhere, and immigrants.
