Shelter from the Storm: The Photographs of Kirk Gittings: Fauntleroy, Gussie: Amazon.sg: Books

Interview with Kirk Gittings, Architectural Photographer at Daminion Blog

While in graduate school working on my MFA, I was fortunate to have studied archeology with Jane Kelley, a seminal Southwest archeologist. As an example take the following extract from the cambridge dictionary.

LIGHT+SPACE+STRUCTURE: Tim Street

In the following year the images were picked up for spreads in Ambiente from Germany, Nikkei Architecture from Japan, and a few years later by two more US publications making the cover of all with accompanying articles and large spreads. The opening had a phenomenal turn out with extensive press and nearly 200 books sold both Chaco Body and Shelter.

In each case, the 55-year-old Albuquerque-based photographer captures the essence of true home: the implied and deeply meaningful presence of human activity — and shelter for that activity — even while actual figures are almost never included in his imagery. Some of their images have a quality of composition, tone, etc, etc, that would qualify them as Art depending, of course, on what you're currently defining Art as. He has made New Mexico his home for forty-five years.
