These shrines were either natural or modified features of the landscape, as well as buildings, where the Inca would visit for worship. This is one of the reasons why the Inca Empire was so powerful: they not only had a multitude of resources, but a set system to make sure all parts of the Empire were able to obtain what they needed. These walls contained leveling fillings to form the platform of the road or to support the soil that could otherwise slide down the slope, as is generally seen in the transversal roads that lead to the coast from the mountains.
