APIC publishes new guide for infection prevention in long

Everyone entering the facility must perform hand hygiene upon entry. Now, there frequently are patients with tracheostomies who are undergoing long-term respirator therapy, patients receiving hemodialysis or peritoneal dialysis, patients with central vascular catheters, and patients receiving nutritional support via percutaneous feeding tubes. Efforts to control VRE transmission in the home should focus on preventing cross-contamination via the nursing bag, clothing, and equipment which is carried to and from the home by the health care professional.

Long Term Care Facilities

Whereas the occurrence of infections has been described and specific guidelines for infection-control programs in long-term care facilities have been developed, there is still limited evaluation of the effectiveness of programs or specific interventions to support prioritization of infection-control resources.

Infection Prevention and Control

For medically necessary trips away from the facility, proceed as in CMS Phase 1.

Long Term Care Facilities

The most important organism, in terms of frequency and morbidity, is influenza A virus; gastrointestinal infections caused by Escherichia coli O157, Salmonella species, and caliciviruses and skin infestations with scabies are other important and relatively common problems.
