Unit 4: Enquiries into Current Research in Health and Social Care

Your set task:
This will be assessed through a task, which will be set by Pearson. You will need to use your skills to carry out research and analyse the findings to present a piece of original research on a health or social care issue, along with your critical analysis of carrying out research relevant to the topic.

Your revision workbook:
This workbook is designed to review the skills that might be needed in your assessed task. The details of what you will need to do are given in the 'Your set task' section above. You can use this to help you tackle or check the Pearson website for the most up-to-date Sample Assessment Materials to get more practice in carrying out research.

To support your revision, this workbook contains revision tasks to help you revise the skills that might be needed in your assessed task. The revision task is divided into sections:

- 1. Revision tasks:
In your workbook you will use your skills to:
 - carry out your own independent secondary research using a range of secondary sources (page 10-14)
 - carry out your own independent secondary research using a range of secondary sources (page 15-17)
 - prepare a list of your secondary sources (page 18)
- 2. Questions:
Your answers to the questions will help you to:
 - understanding of research methods and the validity and reliability of results (page 19)
 - understanding of the importance of research (page 20)
 - how the relationship contributes the importance of the issue (page 21)
 - research implications for future practice and/or practice (page 22)

Skills: Skills to help you to use your skills in the right way. See the information on page 1 for more information.

Improving Health in the Community: A Role for Performance Monitoring. The Health Care and Community Services Project in Escondido, California, illustrates this kind of collaboration among diverse groups and the interconnectedness of health and social systems see. The recent surge in the growth of managed care organizations has taken place in an environment that seeks to continue the delivery of high-quality clinical and personal preventive health services while constraining the costs of care.

Some of the factors, such as genetic makeup, are nearly impossible to alter whereas others are amenable to change.

Understanding health and social care

As Syme 1996 notes, viewing health as a biomedical construct has limited our ability to integrate processes that produce health and to address the underlying causes of disease. Thus, Labour, the Coalition and the Conservatives have portrayed their reforms as being about modernisation and transformation—and all governments have a tendency to emphasise the distinctive nature of their own policies.

Understanding the Health and Social Care Environment

In turn, clear explanations of social policy theory help frame the policy and practice dilemmas faced by students, front-line workers and policy makers.
