I went from my hermitage to Chorten Nyima where I had stayed before. Custom demanded that he should celebrate certain rites meant to assure the welfare of the dead in the next world, at Podang, the chief monastery of his sect in Sekkim. I saw myself surrounded by elephants who pointed at me musical trunks from which came out deep sounds like those of long Teban trumpets.

I could find no matches at hand and being unacquainted with the formation of my pre- historic dwelling I did not dare to move for fear of hurting myself on some pointed rocks. A few weeks after my arrival, the superstitious Dawasandup confessed that he had consulted a mopa diviner about the unexpected attack of hail upon the otherwise gloriously sunny day of my arrival.

Theodore Illion

In these times there lived a strange man, a miracle- worker and rough-speaking philosopher, whose ec- centricities — sometimes coarse — often exaggerated by his biographers, have given birth to a number of stories in the style of Rabelais, much appreciated in Tibet. Certain pupils hesitated to give a friend a hard blow and Only made a pretence of striking him, but Dawa- sandup was on the look out. A Grand Lama had passed his whole life in idleness.
