Constitution

Like nearly all Phoenician cities and colonies, Carthage was primarily settled along the coast; evidence of settlement in the interior dates only to the late fourth century BC, several centuries after its founding. This cabal included a hierarchy topped by the dominant family, usually the wealthiest members of the merchant class, which had some sort of executive power. Virgil portrays her character as even more noble when she offers asylum to and his men, who had recently escaped from.

Ancient Carthage

These were most likely the mizrehim referenced in Carthaginian inscriptions, of which little is known or attested, but which appeared to have been numerous in number and subject, from devotional cults to professional guilds. One theory is that and domination of the Phoenician homeland produced refugees that swelled Carthage's population and transferred the culture, wealth, and traditions of to Carthage.
