In fact, the issue of decontextualised standards per individual language 2 is crucial as they are poorly responding to 3 multilingualism as a reality of biographies, communities, and various levels of literacies. According to them, evaluation schemes are often inconsistent and go against a context-sensitive implementation of profile-bound tools for the evaluation of development. The role of in-service training for language teachers in the domain of language competence average rating: 4.

Multilingualism and the language education landscape: challenges for teacher training in Europe

The identity of a language teacher is different from that of another teacher, though participants highlighted the fact that every teacher is in a way a language teacher Byram ; Byram and Feng.

Multilingual Europe

French was considered the most important language — it used to be very popular in Europe up until a few decades ago or at least in my country and it was the main language of use if you wanted to communicate with foreigners Here most people above 40 including my teachers know French well, but little English.

Multilingualism and the language education landscape: challenges for teacher training in Europe

Therefore, the study identified a maximum of three participants per European country from three relevant areas of intervention in language teacher education; policy makers, language teacher educators, and directors of teacher training institutions. The domains as given below read as complementary polarities - such as identity building on the one hand and professionalization on the other hand - which language teachers and their educational schemes currently struggle to integrate.
